The environmental fate of pesticides is highly complex due to their different modes of action, structures, physicochemical properties and the complexity of environmental matrices in which they are present. The persistence of pesticides in the environment is highly influenced by their degradation pathways and the presence of degrading microorganisms.

The presence of pesticides in the environment may be an important indicator of exposure, whereas their accumulation and bioconcentration are a measure of their risk for humans and the environment. The knowledge of pesticide degradation pathways and the effects of environmental parameters on their degradation can be utilized for optimizing treatment options. This paper summarizes degradation pathways of pesticides under natural conditions and under specific stress conditions. The implications of degradation pathways on the residual concentrations of pesticides in the environment are discussed. When developing film through the process of exposure in a photographic device, photographic images are frequently registered (i.e., exposed
